

Below is the Latin ‘preamble’ to the source file used for the Greek text of the New Testament, along with a translation. The entire text file can be downloaded from Ralph Hancock’s website. The exact provenance of this text (similar to that for the Greek Old Testament) is uncertain; after an enquiry of Ralph Hancock, I received the following in an email response:

Yes, the provenance of those files is untraceable and, because the punctuation is very slightly different from that in Nestle-Aland, no one can accuse you of plagiarising that. Many people have already used these files as a source of text and there has never been a squeak of protest.

The text in the individual files (per book) has been formatted in the usual style, with paragraph breaks added to closely match those of the Nestle-Aland text; some minor textual corrections and verse number adjustments have also been applied, to conform more closely with that work. We have (systematically) changed all occurrences of the 16 ‘deprecated’ Unicode characters with a lone oxia accent to their equivalents with a tonos.
